

Eleanor Rosch: You could say that the path to that is that things become more and more integrated; intention, body, and mind come together, rather than being scattered all this way and that. And you start to be aware of perception happening as it actually does happen from the whole field, not from within a separated perceiver. The notion of field was the closest thing I could come to this sense of integration in our current sciences.

Eleanor Rosch: You could say that the path to that is that things become more and more integrated; intention, body, and mind come together, rather than being scattered all this way and that. And you start to be aware of perception happening as it actually does happen from the whole field, not from within a separated perceiver. The notion of field was the closest thing I could come to this sense of integration in our current sciences.